thick, and weighs ten and three quarter pounds. The jaws were broken, so that the number of teeth could not be ascertained.

The Essex Herald states that the nest of a wagtail, with four perfect eggs, was lately sawn out of a solid elm-tree, at the distance of nine inches from the surface or bark, and that no flaw or aperture leading to this curious enclosure could be discovered.

Magnificent Vase of Aventurine.—A short time ago mention was made in the public papers of a costly vase which the Emperor of Russia had presented to Baron Alexander de Humboldt. This vase is now exhibiting in the Hall of Antiques in the Museum at Berlin. The peculiar stone out of which it has been wrought, renders it unique of its kind; as it is not found either in the central or southern countries of Europe, but seems to be an exclusive production of Siberia. The name which the attendant at the museum gives to it, is that of Aventurine. From the transparency and variegated colours of its veins, its crystalline fineness of texture, and its high susceptibility of polish, it bears a striking resemblance to the finest sort of agate, "the sardonyx, or onyx;" in substance it is like the former, and in its strata and parti-coloured spots it resembles the latter. For multiplicity and alteration of tints, it is in no respect inferior to the most brilliant opal or jasper of Sicily or the Indies. This rare production of nature, which stands, inclusive of the pedestal, eight feet high, shews that Siberia possesses a description of quartz better adapted than any other yet known in southern climates for works of magnitude; for the block from which it was wrought cannot have contained much short of seventy cubic feet of pure stone. The vase is finely moulded after the antique, and has two superb raised arms of massive gold, carved with much taste.—Berlin, 30th September.

Denmark.—The Royal Society of Northern Antiquaries at Copenhagen, whose object is to publish, first, works on ancient northern literature, and then whatever may throw light on the ancient history of the north of Europe, its language, its antiquities, &c.; and under whose auspices a number of the Icelandic Sagas (or ancient fables), with Latin and Danish translations, have appeared; having determined, that from the present year, in order to give its transactions the greatest possible publicity, it would communicate, in a regular journal, an account of its sittings, of its labours, and of the works addressed to it, has accordingly published a procès-verbal of the general assembly of the Society on the 15th of April last; by which it appears to have been very actively engaged in prosecuting the interesting purposes of its establishment.

Additions to the British Fauna.—It is not generally known that three distinct species of three-spined stichlebachs, have been constantly confounded under the name of gasterosteus aculeatus of Linnæus. Mr. Yarell has fished all three species up in the Thames, near Woolwich. They are distinguished by the distribution of the scales, which in the first extend throughout the whole length of the side. In the second, they reach no farther backwards than the line of the vent; and lastly, in the third species, the lateral scales extend no farther than the ends of the rays of pectoral fins.

Silk from Cobwebs.—At a late meeting of the Society of Arts, a gentleman exhibited some very fine silk which he had obtained from the web of the spider; it possessed considerable strength, and a beautiful metallic lustre. Many species of spider have been tried, and food of a varied character given to them—the larvæ of flies successfully.

Specific Identity of Anagallis arvensis and cærulea.—The Rev. J. S. Henslow, professor of botany in the University of Cambridge, received last year some specimens and seeds of Anagallis cærulea, gathered in Yorkshire. From these seeds the professor raised a dozen plants, nine of which had blue flowers, and three red.

French Journals.—In a pamphlet lately published in Paris it is asserted, that the sum expended by the old government in the purchase of a portion of the daily press of the French capital, amounted to 4,075,439 francs; and the manner in which that sum was distributed is detailed.

Magnificent Vase of Aventurine.—A short time ago mention was made in the public papers of a costly vase which the Emperor of Russia had presented to Baron Alexander de Humboldt. This vase is now exhibiting in the Hall of Antiques in the Museum at Berlin. The peculiar stone out of which it has been wrought, renders it unique of its kind; as it is not found either in the central or southern countries of Europe, but seems to be an exclusive production of Siberia. The name which the attendant at the museum gives to it, is that of Aventurine. From the transparency and variegated colours of its veins, its crystalline fineness of texture, and its high susceptibility of polish, it bears a striking resemblance to the finest sort of agate, "the sardonyx, or onyx;" in substance it is like the former, and in its strata and parti-coloured spots it resembles the latter. For multiplicity and alteration of tints, it is in no respect inferior to the most brilliant opal or jasper of Sicily or the Indies. This rare production of nature, which stands, inclusive of the pedestal, eight feet high, shews that Siberia possesses a description of quartz better adapted than any other yet known in southern climates for works of magnitude; for the block from which it was wrought cannot have contained much short of seventy cubic feet of pure stone. The vase is finely moulded after the antique, and has two superb raised arms of massive gold, carved with much taste.—Berlin, 30th September.

Additions to the British Fauna.—It is not generally known that three distinct species of three-spined stichlebachs, have been constantly confounded under the name of gasterosteus aculeatus of Linnæus. Mr. Yarell has fished all three species up in the Thames, near Woolwich. They are distinguished by the distribution of the scales, which in the first extend throughout the whole length of the side. In the second, they reach no farther backwards than the line of the vent; and lastly, in the third species, the lateral scales extend no farther than the ends of the rays of pectoral fins.

Silk from Cobwebs.—At a late meeting of the Society of Arts, a gentleman exhibited some very fine silk which he had obtained from the web of the spider; it possessed considerable strength, and a beautiful metallic lustre. Many species of spider have been tried, and food of a varied character given to them—the larvæ of flies successfully.
